

QUANTUM CONFESSIONS

Stephen Oram

Perfect trust is like a pure glass sphere. It's beautiful, precious and fragile. The perfect trust I had in my parents had just suffered its first hairline crack. I was six years old, I was moving country and I was dreading the future.

“A veritable head trip; yet rooted in a believable and sometimes visceral near-future.”

Grey is a high performing student with attitude. Aled is torn between his morals and his desires. They live in a world where those who believe in absolute truth are on a collision course with those who don't. Society is becoming dangerously polarised and despite a thread of history that binds Aled and Grey together they take opposite sides in the conflict; Grey is recruited by The Project and Aled is given custody of The Proof of Existence.

Against the backdrop of a failing society and experiments to find the link between quantum physics and a supreme being, the real question that unfolds is...

“Who chooses your reality?”

About the Author

Stephen Oram lives in Fitzrovia, London. As a teenager he was heavily influenced by the ethos of punk. In his early twenties he embraced the squatter scene and then joined a religious cult, briefly. He did some computer stuff in what became London's silicon roundabout and is now a civil servant with a gentle attraction to anarchism. His fascination with exploring our darker places through near-future fiction prompted him to imagine alternative worlds and then write about them.
